The first new office building on campus, AOL's four-story, 230,000 square foot Creative Center Two complements and extends the initial phases of the campus. A center atrium introduces daylight and offers collaborative spaces critical to interactive work. Situated around the atrium are reconfigurable open and enclosed offices that support programmers and office staff. The 500-foot primary public façade, a glass and silver metal curtain wall, is broken with a series of simple vertical notches. At the rear courtyard, logic is reversed with glass and metal infill woven into the concrete structure with vertical glass bays. Column free space, underfloor air distribution and individual desktop lighting controls support the flexible workspace.
